Anticipating Community, Producing Dissent: The Politics of Recent Chinese Intellectual Praxis*

Gloria Davies

Abstract

This paper explores the ongoing debate between the “liberals” and the “New Left” in relation to the rhetorical and discursive strategies adopted by various authors on both sides of this “ideological” division. In articulating the need for greater democracy and social justice in present-day Mainland Chinese society, these authors deploy tropes and concepts drawn from a wide range of Chinese and EuroAmerican sources. Their common anticipation of community — the word that is now most frequently used in Anglophone scholarship to signify the common good — has produced dissent and debate, primarily because of the different ways in which these authors have formulated their vision of the common good. This paper also examines the foundational concepts and values that underpin “liberal” and “New Left” conceptualizations of the common good, and situates their differently formulated concerns in the context of both globalization and a transformed Chinese party-state, whose current ideology shares much in common with the economic rationalistic doctrine of neo-liberalism.

Gloria Davies is based in the School of Languages, Cultures and Linguistics at Monash University, where she is also involved in the work of the Centre for Comparative Literature and Cultural Studies. She has published many articles in the field of modern Chinese literary and cultural studies, and on cross-cultural issues in literary, postcolonial and critical theory. Her recent work includes Voicing Concerns: Contemporary Chinese Critical Inquiry published by Rowman and Littlefield in 2001.