Unafraid of the Ghost:
The Victim Mentality of Mao Zedong and the Two Taiwan Strait Crises in the 1950s*

Kuisong Yang and Sheng Mao

Abstract

This article examines the origin of the two Taiwan Strait crises in 1954–1955 and 1958. Whereas the previous literature has focused on how domestic and international factors led to the shelling of Jinmen, this study investigates the effects of Mao’s victim mentality. Like many other intellectuals in the late Qing and Republican eras, Mao was deeply disturbed by the Chinese “century of humiliation,” a historical narrative emphasizing foreign intervention and imperialist aggression. Such feelings of humiliation and victimization were reinforced when the American fleet blocked Mao’s plan to reunify China in the 1950s. It is argued that Mao’s victim mentality was a significant factor contributing to his decision to shell Jinmen twice. By analyzing this case, this article reveals the emotional side of the PRC diplomacy.

Kuisong YANG is the Zijiang Distinguished Professor of History at East China Normal University and Professor of History at Peking University. His research focuses on political history and foreign relations in twentieth-century China.

Sheng MAO is a Ph.D. candidate in Chinese History at the University of Pennsylvania. He is working on a dissertation about Xinjiang as the borderland between China and the Soviet Union in the 1950s and 1960s.

* The authors would like to thank Professors Siyen Fei and Yafeng Xia as well as two anonymous reviewers for their insightful comments.