Censorship, Regulations, and the Cinematic Cold War in Hong Kong (1947–1971)*

Ying Du

Abstract

Based primarily on archives from Hong Kong, the United Kingdom, and the United States Information Service (USIS), this article uncovers the trajectory of the Hong Kong film political censorship system from 1947 to 1971 through interrogating interactions between the configuration of a series of regulations and misgivings about and treatments of imported PRC, USIS, and Taiwan films that had political references. I examine colonial political censorship of imported films as a local response to both Chinese politics (the CCP vs. the KMT) and Cold War politics (the PRC vs. the United States-plus-Taiwan, the PRC vs. the United Kingdom-plus-Hong Kong), on the one hand; and as a strategy of cultural governance vis-à-vis the vulnerability of Hong Kong and the control of the internal stability during the 1950s and 1960s, on the other. I argue that the censorship system helped the colonial authorities maintain a degree of cultural autonomy vis-à-vis both UK imperial policy and the cinematic propaganda war between the PRC and the United States-plus-Taiwan in Hong Kong during this turbulent period.

Ying Du is Associate Professor at the Department of Chinese Language and Literature, East China Normal University, PRC. Correspondence should be addressed to ydu@zhwx.ecnu.edu.cn.

* I would like to thank two anonymous reviewers for their insightful comments on an earlier version of this essay. This research project is sponsored by Shanghai Pujiang Program. I am also deeply grateful for the generous support provided by the Visiting Scholar Program of the Universities Service Centre for China Studies, the Chinese University of Hong Kong.